Question 4:

Cognitive Load Theory

Cognitive load refers to the used amount of working memory resources required to process new information. Unlike long-term memory, which has a vast capacity, working memory is inherently limited; therefore, providing too much data at once can result in a state of mental overload. Research suggests that when the cognitive demands of a task exceed an individual's processing ability, learning efficiency significantly declines. For instance, a student attempting to solve a complex mathematical equation while simultaneously learning a new software interface may struggle to retain either skill because their mental resources are split. Moreover, instructional designers often distinguish between intrinsic load, which is the inherent difficulty of the material, and extraneous load, which is caused by the way information is presented. By reducing unnecessary distractions and breaking complex concepts into smaller, manageable segments, educators can optimize the learning process. Ultimately, understanding these mental constraints is essential for developing effective educational strategies that enhance retention and promote deeper intellectual engagement.

Which of the following best states the main idea of the passage?

- A. The capacity of long-term memory is significantly larger than that of working memory.
- B. Students should avoid learning multiple skills simultaneously to ensure long-term retention.
- C. Effective education requires managing the limited resources of working memory to avoid mental overload.
- D. Intrinsic load is the most important factor for instructional designers to consider when creating materials.

Your answer: C. Effective education requires managing the limited resources of working memory to avoid mental overload.

- D. It can negatively impact learning efficiency if the demands are too high.

Your answer: A. It increases the capacity of long-term memory when tasks are complex.

What can be inferred from the passage about the role of instructional designers?

- A. They focus primarily on increasing the intrinsic difficulty of the subject matter.
- B. They aim to restructure information to minimize the mental resources wasted on distractions.
- C. They believe that students should be exposed to as much data as possible to expand working memory.
- D. They prefer teaching software interfaces over mathematical equations.

- B. By comparing human memory to computer software and highlighting the flaws in both.

- C. By presenting a historical timeline of how memory research has evolved over the years.
- D. By debating the differences between intrinsic and extraneous load and concluding that one is irrelevant.

Question 8:Social Facilitation

Social facilitation is a psychological phenomenon where an individual's performance improves or declines simply due to the presence of others. The core principle suggests that being observed increases physiological arousal, which subsequently strengthens a person's dominant response to a task. For instance, research conducted by Robert Zajonc demonstrated that for well-learned or simple tasks, such as a professional athlete performing a routine drill, the presence of an audience often enhances speed and accuracy. However, when a task is novel or highly complex, the same social pressure can lead to social inhibition, causing the individual to make more errors than they would in private. This distinction is frequently attributed to the fear of evaluation or the distraction caused by monitoring one's own behavior. Therefore, the impact of a crowd is not uniform; it acts as a catalyst that amplifies existing skill levels. Understanding this dynamic is crucial for organizing workplace environments and athletic competitions, as it highlights how social context directly influences human productivity and success.

What is the primary purpose of the passage?

- A. To argue that professional athletes perform better than amateurs under pressure.
- B. To describe the physiological changes that occur when an individual is being observed.
- C. To explain how the presence of others can either improve or hinder performance depending on the task.

Context: Listen to a lecture about the causes and impacts of deforestation.

Transcript: Deforestation is the large scale removal of forests, often with land converted to farms or settlements. The main direct causes are agricultural expansion, cattle ranching, soy, and palm oil, along with commercial logging and the building of roads and mines. These activities are pushed by global demand for food, timber, and minerals, and they grow faster where laws are weak or poorly enforced. The impacts are far reaching. Forests store huge amounts of carbon. When trees are cut or burned, that carbon enters the atmosphere, accelerating climate change. Forest loss also breaks up habitats, putting thousands of species at risk and reducing pollination and natural pest control. Locally, fewer trees mean drier air and altered rainfall, which can reduce river flow and increase the chance of drought or flash floods. Without roots to hold soil, erosion rises, damaging farms and communities. Socially, deforestation can displace indigenous peoples and undermine traditional livelihoods. The good news is we know many solutions, improving yields on existing farmland, creating and enforcing protected areas, using certified wood and palm oil, and restoring degraded lands. I'll talk about how countries are implementing these strategies next.

Context: Listen to a lecture about how recycling systems work in modern cities.

Transcript: In modern cities, recycling is a coordinated system, not just a blue bin. It starts at home or work with separate containers for paper, plastics, glass, and sometimes food waste. The cleaner the items, the better. Food residue can contaminate whole loads. Collection trucks take these materials to a recycling plant where machines and people sort them. Conveyors spread items out, magnets pull out steel, and air jets or optical scanners separate different types of plastic. Glass is crushed into cullet, metals are baled, and paper is bundled, and then all of these are sold to manufacturers as raw material. A key challenge is contamination and wish cycling when we toss in things that are not accepted. That adds cost and can send an entire batch to the landfill. Cities try to reduce this with clear labels, education campaigns, and increasingly, digital apps that tell you what goes where. Policy also matters. Deposit return systems for bottles and pay as you throw fees raise recycling rates.
